Adobe Photoshop is a highly versatile program that allows you to create 2D and 3D images. A Photoshop masters course will teach you the fundamentals of Photoshop, giving you the knowledge and skills to perfect all aspects of Photoshop. There are three main areas for using Photoshop: Raster images - these are the pixels or points on the screen that make up an image. A raster image is a grid-based system, based on dots that cover the screen. The dots can be changed in number or size to create an image. Photoshop's raster image editing features include resizing, moving or rotating a raster image, coloring, cropping, merging, or deleting pixels to remove areas, and creating new pixels by cloning pixels from one section of the image and applying them to another area. Vector images - an image that consists of lines (called vectors) that have a finite, specific number of points or end points. The points are connected, allowing the vectors to be used to manipulate and create complex shapes. Vector images cannot be touched or edited, even with raster images. The image editing tools for vectors include the ability to erase or modify vectors, draw new ones, or convert them to raster images. 3D graphics - a true 3D image is composed of objects that have a depth or distance to one another. Photoshop's 3D tools include 3D objects, camera tools, and the 3D

Modeling function. Objects in a 3D image can be manipulated by moving them in and out, changing their rotation, or altering their color. While Photoshop's raster image editing features are limited, its 3D editing tools are much more powerful. Photoshop also has many features designed for specific types of images. Its tools are designed for creating specific types of images, such as web graphics. Photoshop's raster editing features are simple and easy-to-use, making it a popular choice for beginners. Raster images are the most familiar type of image that many people have seen, so it's easy to start using Photoshop with them. How to Use Photoshop Open the image you wish to use In Photoshop, images are organized by layers. Layers are a way to build up a certain area of your image, or to paint over parts of an existing image. To add a new layer, click on the Add Layer icon (the plus sign), then select the type of layer you wish to add, such as a

1. Adobe Photoshop Elements Adobe Photoshop Elements is the basic version of Photoshop. It is a good option for the users who need basic editing and basic image creation. In fact, Photoshop elements is one of the best and easiest software to create mock ups. You can get it from here. 2. Adobe Photoshop CC Adobe Photoshop CC is the professional version of Photoshop. Q: Many computers are responding to URL query strings using a shell script? I have a website that is making POST requests to itself and I'm trying to figure out why. I installed ZAP and noticed that my website is requesting an URL query string and ZAP recognizes that the URL is a normal shell script and the URL is pointing to a folder on my computer. I checked my web server logs and the server is responding with a log in the

URL and a shell script called index.sh. I can view the script and it looks like this: #!/bin/bash webApp() { curl -X GET --header "Pragma: no-cache" \ -H "Accept-Encoding: gzip, deflate" \ -H "Connection: keep-alive" \ -H "User-Agent: Mozilla/5.0 (Windows NT 6.3; WOW64) AppleWebKit/537.36 (KHTML, like Gecko) Chrome/42.0.2311.135 Safari/537.36" \ -H "Host: localhost:8080" \ -H "Referer: localhost:8080/index.sh?unid=${unid}&cred=$(python2)credentials.py" \ } webApp This is the URL I'm passing to ZAP (the URL that the log in is redirected to). The argument that the unid variable has is because I'm running the script from another directory and the credentials are stored in a file. The credentials are stored in a file for security and I simply needed a way to run the script in my browser. I can run the script on its own and it works as expected. If I look in my web server logs, it's loading the index.sh file and executing it instead of the redirecting the original URL. I have Apache2

Say something (not pestering) - frekek I've found myself drawn to'say something' threads quite often, it seems that every few weeks one shows up in Hacker News. I'm the type of person who would, in most situations, prefer to just leave the conversation behind once I've said something because I don't like the feeling of being 'pestered' that comes from someone that I don't want to bother.So what say you - I'd appreciate some insight into what the magic may be to get a comment as to why someone's said something, without it coming across as 'pestering' (for lack of a better term).I'm not asking for a reason here, that's the first thing that might come to mind - but I'd like to better understand the 'why' and what sets this apart from just letting it go and moving on. ====== anigbrowl Maybe this is just the way a lot of us feel, but I've been sensitive to this since childhood. I liked to be the one who would finish a conversation, but would still like to engage in meaningful discourse. So if someone says something and I do not feel that they are prepared to converse with me professionally, I may regard it as a bad-faith attempt to bully or manipulate me into some sort of dialogue. I realize I don't make it clear all the time, but I try to reassure people that I appreciate their comments on discussion topics as part of the community, and would rather engage than ignore. Do feel free to contact me privately if this is a problem. ------ russss I liked this line: > So what say you - I'd appreciate some insight into what the magic may be to > get a comment as to why someone's said something, without it coming across > as 'pestering' (for lack of a better term). I imagine this could be as big an issue for those who read HN than for those that post. ------ kjhughes Yes, it is usually less than gracious if someone says something really rude or meaningless to you and expects you to respond. They might have said it to someone else, but didn't expect you to hear it and/or respond. Sometimes the person may just be struggling with feeling attacked by their
